At 3 a.m. on the 23rd after the moon had gone down, the party assembled in the engine house and after the machinery had been explained to Admiral Kawamura he was asked to start the first electric light (on shore) in Japan. He took the lever in his hand, and at once the electric light flashed out shining clearly and brilliantly, and burning steadily, without the least flicker or hiss. The party then went the round of the lights, which are placed four in the large, two in the small dook, and the other ten in the different machine shops. Then several of the lamps were "cut out" one at a time by means of the switch on the samp board to shew how any light could be turned on or off at will When the party was in front of the large dock brightly lighted, the engineer was requested to turn off the whole circuit, which was instantly
